Would you support a checkoff program to support grape and wine research and marketing efforts?

Officially called research and promotion programs, checkoff programs give agricultural producers, importers and other stakeholders in the marketing chain the power to maximize resources while managing risk. Funded and operated by industry stakeholders, checkoff programs allow commodity groups to pool resources for applied research, market research, new product development and consumer education. They empower the industry chain to establish their own goals and decide for themselves how to best develop new markets and strengthen current markets for specific commodities. For every $1 spent in a research and promotion program the return on investment can range as high as $18. (USDA.gov)

Producers and processors usually finance the checkoff programs from assessments charged on a per unit basis of the marketed commodity, usually on a basis of half a percent or one percent.
